ABOUT THE SEMINAR

A good and peaceful society is built ethically on values including compassion, empathy, respect, honesty, fairness, and responsibility. These principles affect not only personal character but also the operation of institutions and societies. Promoting fundamental human values is crucial for building a more compassionate, inclusive, and sustainable future in front of mounting polarization and environmental problems.

Titled "Fostering Universal Human Values: Building a Compassionate, Inclusive, and Sustainable Society," the proposed national seminar aims to investigate in the modern setting the relevance, application, and influence of these values. It seeks to gather educators, researchers, policy-makers, social workers, and students to consider how human values could be successfully included into leadership, government, education, and community development.

Particularly underlined will be the need of education in forming value-oriented citizens, the need of inclusion in advancing social harmony, and the need of sustainable practices anchored in ethical responsibility. The seminar will provide a forum for ideas to be shared, best practices to be discussed, and methods to foster a society more sensitive to values to be developed.

Through a value-based approach to development and human interaction, this seminar hopes to support the more general goal of nation-building by means of meaningful discourse and cooperation.

OBJECTIVES OF THE SEMINAR

- To discuss the strategies to promote moral and ethical growth among students and young people by means of education.
- To promote multidisciplinary approach for including values into environmental, social, and financial policies.
- To give academicians, students, researchers and other stakeholders a platform to present studies, ideas, and best practices about universal human values.
- To emphasize the link among ethical living, sustainability, and inclusion.
- To jointly consider how universal human values might act as compass points for personal development, social peace, and world welfare.
